10 ways to reshape
where work happens

The future of work is changing. Whether your workforce is remote, on-site or a combination of both, the time to plan for the new normal is now. As you rethink and rebuild your workplace, here are 10 deliberate strategies to consider for reshaping where work gets done.

telework formally

Offering part- and full-time remote work options for specific jobs is an attractive benefit that can increase your talent base and productivity while reducing overhead costs.

set up a hybrid program

Allowing employees to split their time between working remotely and on-site can help companies find the right balance of "me" versus "we" space, supporting both employee and business needs.

create a safe workspace plan

Creating a plan for a safe work environment that protects employees and customers from the risk of COVID-19 can help your business and workforce thrive.

level up wfh

Adopting proven policies, procedures and technologies that support working from home can help make your program more effective and productive.

decentralize the workplace

Pivoting to a fully remote workforce, with teams working from home or offices around the world, can help companies to remain nimble, scalable and competitive.

try hot desking

Hot desking offers first-come, first-served workspace assignments, rather than permanently assigned desks, promoting on-site flexibility, maximizing office space and reducing overhead costs.

promote hoteling

Hoteling offers workspace flexibility by allowing employees to reserve their desk, conference room or office, so you can reduce your office's footprint without shrinking your workforce.

consider coworking

Sharing workspace with diverse groups of professionals offers employees flexibility and community while saving overhead costs.

return to the workplace

Following CDC guidelines and information as you welcome employees back into the office safely can help alleviate fears and support well-being while establishing a new normal.

support virtual collaboration

Supporting your remote teams with collaborative tools and technologies maximizes productivity while encouraging independence.
